

Infectious Hepatitis—infection Of Liver—increasing in County

By ROY O. GILBERT, M.D., Los Angeles County Health Officer

For several years the number of reported cases of infectious hepatitis reported in Los Angeles County has been steadily increasing.

Indeed, the increase in reporting since 1950 is tenfold, with a total of 1114 cases reported last year. So far in 1957 the rate has been slightly higher than in 1956.

Infectious hepatitis is of concern to public health officials since the disease is usually more prevalent in areas or institutions where sanitary living conditions are poor and, from these places, the infection may spread elsewhere in the county.

Liver Infection

This disorder is basically an infection of the liver and is caused by a virus. Also called epidemic hepatitis, epidemic jaundice, or catarrhal jaundice, the disease is most common among young people, the largest incidence occurring between 10 and 14 years of age. Symptoms of the disorder may appear anywhere from 15 to 35 days after the person is infected. Most typical are the digestive disturbances which may include loss of appetite, nausea with or without vomiting, diarrhea, and pain in the upper right abdomen. Enlargement and tenderness of the liver may be elicited by physical examination, and a slight fever, weakness, and headache may also be present.

More severe cases of this ailment are accompanied by jaundice, giving a yellow color to the skin and the whites of the eyes. When as severe as this, illness usually lasts for several weeks or months and on rare occasions may cause death.

Usually Mild

Ordinarily, however, the illness caused by infectious hepatitis is mild in nature. Like polio, another virus disease, a person may harbor the infection or have a mild attack without knowing it. Such individuals, without any signs of illness whatsoever, may nevertheless be carriers of the virus and so infect those persons with whom they come in contact.

Lawyers Plan Meeting

The first annual tri-meeting of the South Bay, Inglewood, and Harbor Bar Assn. will be held at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday at the Portuguese Bend Club. Joe Ball, president of the California State Bar Assn., will be the speaker.
